In October 2009 the Government launched a new strategy to make Careers Education and Information, Advice and Guidance (IAG) more relevant to the 21st century. The Information, Advice and Guidance strategy aims to make careers education more accessible for young people and ensure each one of them, whatever their background, can make the right education and training choices so they have the best possible chance of succeeding.

What are young people entitled to under the Tregonwell's IAG strategy?

- Excellent, personalised, and impartial careers information, advice, and guidance in schools
- Support for parents so they can help their children to make the right decisions
- Lots of opportunities for young people to get a feel for different courses and careers, through taster sessions and high-quality experiences – both of further education and of workplaces
- Opportunities to build a relationship with a respected adult through mentoring or shadowing
